EXPLAINING THE DECLINE IN GRADUATE ENROLLMENTS

The downturn in the economy appears to have played a significant role in the decline in enrollments in education, especially at public universities by and among more vulnerable populations (i.e., working women, part-time students, and recent graduates seeking their first position). In addition, a set of policy changes at both the college and state level were implemented that were intended to improve the overall quality of applicants, selected degree programs, and graduates seeking certification. These changes appear to have constrained the applicant pool and thereby lowered the number while increasing the quality of candidates. In addition, the proliferation of on-line graduate programs (NB: University of West Alabama), an increased emphasis on paid summer professional development workshops for school employees, and the threat and/or reality of unemployment for school employees and family members seem to have made their contribution to the constellation of causes for declining enrollments as well.
